

Destination RV ?

To decide whether or not you should join the group of recreational vehicle owners we'll try a quick quiz. It's time for a bit of self analysis:
Do you see the journey to your holiday destination as being a necessary difficulty?
Does the thought of coping without room service or does self catering fill you with dread?
Do you prefer to stay in or around a single location when visiting another area?
Does driving at anything less than the maximum speed limit seem incomprehensible?
Does meeting other road users or camping site residents seem incidental?

If the answer to most of the above was yes, then please stay away from RV ownership! On the other hand, allow me to paint a rather different picture:
The journey can be more interesting and rewarding than visiting any single destination. The freedom of cooking meals at a time of your choice or eating out gives more scope for enjoyment. Most areas have locations which are diverse and fascinating to explore. A journey should be characterised by a relaxed and considerate frame of mind. Meeting other people with similar and sometimes diverse interests can be educational & fun.

So, the choice is yours. Just don't forget to look around the showground at some of the finest American RV's you'll see anywhere. Including the US!
